

Frankie Melito
Security Council
Representing: Libertad Digital

Debate Transitions to Discuss the Kidnapped Turkish Parliament

While the Security Council discussed efforts on the Kurdish independence movement, a press release came up that stated a vital Turkish parliament member was kidnapped by the Kurdish people.

The PKK (Kurdistan Workers Party) has had dramatizing efforts to gain independence from the Turkish and Iraqi area. The Security Council in the United Nations was just about ready to help them in this movement when all of a sudden a press release came up that determined a Turkish parliament member was kidnapped by the Kurdistan Workers Party.

Focus suddenly turned to helping Turkey with this issue. The United States delegate stated that “The Security Council must launch a search and rescue team to find this parliament member.” The delegate of Sweden picked up on this issue and supplemented that Sweden, along with other countries, must succor the United States in these efforts. Delegates argued that this was a crisis update as debate drifted away from the original topic of the Kurdish independence movement.

Back to the issue on the Kurdish independence movement, delegates were almost unanimous on the decision that the Security Council must aid the Kurds in their independence movement. However, delegates disagreed on how the Security Council must help them.

Some delegates brought up the effort of an embargo against Turkey, if they would not comply with the Kurdish movement. The delegate from France proclaimed: “The delegation of France will not remove the embargo until Turkey uses diplomatic methods to solve the conflict.”

The delegate from Sweden agreed.

Surprisingly, Russia stated that their delegation will not support any type of military tasks efforts to be used to help the Kurd's. The delegate stated “The Russian delegation must avoid World War III with Turkey and their allies.” Some delegations noted that they were dubious on the idea that Russia will not use military force.